Closed Captioning: FCC Seeks Input on Responsibility

Back in Feb, the FCC adopted rules governing closed captioning to improve the accessibility of TV programming for the deaf and hard of hearing. As an initial step, the agency placed responsibility for compliance on video programming distributors (VPDs). Because closed captioning usually occurs in the production stage, the NCTA argued in its filing that "the creation and delivery of good quality captions is not solely within the control of any one entity and often requires coordination and execution among many connected parties in the video delivery chain." So now the FCC has issued a further NPRM that contemplates extending some compliance responsibilities (related to provision and quality of closed captioning) beyond VPDs to others involved in production and delivery. ACA has argued that imposing compliance liability on the video programmer when it's the source of the problem is "preferable from a policy perspective." It noted that the FCC's IP Closed Captioning Order (approved in July) found that video programmers and owners should cover quality compliance while VPDs should be responsible for passing through captioning intact. In addition, several parties have proposed requiring video programmers to file contact information for inclusion in a registry or separate database, and the FCC wants to know the costs and benefits of doing so. The agency also wants to know whether it should change its rules regarding closed captioning certifications. The rules now allow VPDs to reply on certifications from "programming suppliers" to demonstrate compliance. And programming suppliers include content producers, owners, networks, syndicators and other distributors: "Should the Commission amend the rule to replace the term 'programming supplier' with the term 'video programmer?," asked the agency, which noted that unlike the term "programming supplier," "video programmer" doesn't include VPDs. Rather, it's defined as "any entity that provides video programming that is intended for distribution to residential households including, but not limited to, broadcast or non-broadcast television networks and the owners of such programming."

Court Fight: The FCC has plenty of options to deny 3rd parties to access programming contract information as part of its review of the proposed Comcast-Time Warner Cable and AT&T-DirecTV mergers, several programmers said in their opening briefs filed at the DC Circuit. The filing followed the court's decision to stay the FCC's decision to allow 3rd parties to access programming contracts as part of the merger review. Programmers, including CBS, Disney, Time Warner, 21st Century Fox and Viacom, worried that disclosing contract information might hurt them in future negotiations with 3rd parties. The Commission could instead release redacted data, the programmers said. The agency also hasn't provided enough evidence to show why disclosing the information is necessary. The FCC has said "only a very restricted category of persons" will be allowed to look at the information—and it wouldn't include anyone engaged in "competitive decision-making." Outsiders' input on the deals "will be critical to the agency's review of the pending mergers." It also argued that the programmers offer no factual basis to conclude that violations will inevitably occur.

NBCU Expands TVE: NBCU continued to expand its TVE lineup, adding Bravo Now and Telemundo Now on Microsoft's Xbox One, enabling subs to access programming upon authentication. Xbox One's platform already features USA Now and Syfy Now.

Sunlight Foundation: Anti-net neutrality comments dominated the latest round of the FCC's comment period, said the Sunlight Foundation, a nonprofit that seeks to increase government transparency. Sunlight attributed this shift almost entirely to the form-letter initiatives of a single organization, American Commitment, whose campaign accounted for 56.5% of the 2nd round comments. Sunlight also noted that some 75% of pro-net neutrality comments in the 1st round that ended in July stemmed from a similar form letter campaign by net neutrality advocates and consumer groups. In any event, Sunlight questioned the FCC's count of total comments (3.9mln), saying it counted 1mln fewer comments in the 2nd round alone. "As was true in round one, we fail to see how the FCC arrived at the count that was widely publicized," the group said, adding however that it's difficult to know what the actual count is, given the different comment formats. The agency started to accept email comments following several outages of its legacy comment system.

Adobe Video Report: Amazon's Kindle Fire and Samsung Galaxy are much more likely to be used to watch videos than other mobile devices, with 85% and 83% of all visits to media sites respectively resulting in a video view, according to Adobe's 3Q 2014 US Digital Video Benchmark Report. The analysis is based on 177bln total online video starts captured by Adobe Analytics. Meanwhile, iOS devices were responsible for 56% of all online TV viewing in 3Q, up 9% YOY. Some 46% of online TV content viewing within the broadcast and cable genre occurs through a browser. The TV industry's multiplatform effort seems to be paying off: TVE video growth continued through 3Q, up 108% YOY and 38% over the previous quarter. Mobile devices accounted for 29% of all TVE video starts.
